The Best College Entrance Exam For Your Child

SAT

Based on the information you've shared and the little I know about you and your child's situation, the college entrance exam that's right for your child, is the SAT.

SAT

Here's What That Means...

Now here's what that means: What that means is your child will likely score highest on the SAT, which is the standardized test used by colleges for admissions and scholarships for financial aid.

The SAT is a 3-hour standardized exam that is out of 1600 points. The subjects covered on the SAT include Math, Reading, and Writing. Most students take the SAT during their 11th grade or 12th grade year before they apply to college.

Achieving a high SAT score can help your child receive admission into top universities as well as earn six-figure scholarships to lower the cost of college tuition.

SAT

Common Mistakes & Pitfalls

That said, the SAT is not an easy standardized test. In fact, one of the biggest mistakes parents run into when signing up their student to take the SAT is as follows:

Parents assume their child will score well on the SAT because he or she gets good grades in school.

The truth is high school does not prepare your student for the SAT. This is why many students score poorly on the SAT, have significant test anxiety, and fail to gain admission into top colleges with six-figure scholarships.

Let me explain...

You see, without preparing for the SAT outside of high school, your child will surely score poorly on this standardized test.

Now, you may be thinking...I heard that the SAT is no longer important because colleges are going test-optional. Do not believe the media – this is simply NOT true. Here are 3 reasons your child still take the SAT:

#1 Scholarships

While many colleges are going test-optional for admissions, they are still awarding SCHOLARSHIPS based on test scores. This means that if your child does not take the SAT, they will not be eligible for $5 BILLION IN MERIT SCHOLARSHIPS that are awarded annually to students based on their SAT scores.

#2 Academic Competitive Edge

In addition, a high SAT score will give your student an ACADEMIC COMPETITIVE EDGE. Unless your child has something that makes them really stand out (i.e. they are the star of the high school football team or they started a non-profit in a third world country), my guess is that your child will be applying to college based on their academic merit. If your child has a high SAT score, they will have an ACADEMIC COMPETITIVE EDGE that validates to college admissions committees that your child is a smart high school student who deserves admission to their university.

#3 2022 Study

Finally, a 2022 study found admissions statistics from over 100 OF THE MOST COMPETITIVE COLLEGES & UNIVERSITIES in the country show that students who submitted SAT scores were accepted at rates more than 250% HIGHER than students who did not submit SAT scores when applying to college...even at test-optional colleges!

In summary, if your child does not take the SAT, they will not be eligible for $5 billion in scholarships, will not have an academic competitive edge when applying to college, and will not get into their dream university.

SAT

Here's What You Can Do About It

Thankfully there are some practical and achievable steps you can take to avoid those outcomes and to help your student achieve a high SAT score, get into top colleges, and earn six-figure scholarships!

Here's what you can do almost immediately to start preparing your student for the SAT at home.

Practice makes perfect. This is the age-old adage for almost every endeavor and is no less true for SAT preparation. While it's no secret that practicing for the SAT will improve your score, most students don't know which questions to practice on.

The College Board is the company that creates the SAT. The questions released by the College Board are the best practice problems available. Only the College Board can offer genuine SAT questions that have been used in the past on actual SAT examinations and will be consistent with future SAT questions. No third-party company possesses the College Board's statistics and data to produce real SAT problems. So in order for practice to make perfect on the SAT, you must practice with perfect questions from the testmaker -- the College Board!
